Asked by Mr Cain MLA on 17 February 2022: Attorney-General took on notice the following question(s):

[Ref: Hansard Transcript 17 February 2022, page 62]

In relation to: You mentioned Tasmania is able to operate this scheme, or planning to, and also – so I would invite your response to that, and secondly, given there was a scheme in the territory – I am not quite sure – you can fill me on the background to that and why that was withdrawn.

Attorney- General: The answer to the Member's question is as follows:–

The ACT operated an electronic monitoring scheme in conjunction with home detention from 2001 to 2004. Offenders who received a sentence of less than eighteen months were provided the opportunity to serve their sentence at home, enabling participation in employment, school and maintaining family ties, while subject to constant electronic surveillance.

In 2004 a review was undertaken on home detention, which found low referral and uptake rates, as well as a low completion rate. Due to the lack of utility, a decision to phase out home detention was made by the ACT Government prior to introduction of the Crimes (Sentencing) Bill 2005, which provides for other sentencing options. Re-establishing a home detention scheme was considered around 2013 to mitigate accommodation pressures at the Alexander Maconochie Centre (AMC).

ACT Corrective Services subsequently explored the feasibility of introducing Electronic Monitoring (EM) around 2016-17, including consultation with other jurisdictions where EM has been used for a number of years. EM was not pursued further due to a range of limiting factors, including technological limitations, potential service delivery and outcome issues, and resource implications.

Future consideration of Electronic Monitoring is a matter for Government and may require legislative amendments.
