

Bronwyn Stevenson

To whom it may Concern,

I had two boys attending Flynn Primary

School when it closed. One Son went on to highschool but the other son still had two years left in school (primary).

During the so called Inquiry Process we were led to believe that the chances of Flynn staying open were better than they were so, I, as a parent, didn't research schools capable of a better education for my ADHD spurger son. The faculty of Flynn had been very good at coping with the needs of my son.

Talking to people about the school closures, I was told by a person working in the education department, that Flynn Primary was definitely closing and that a few of the other schools earmarked eg: Mount radgers etc, were put on the list were to remain open so the government looked like they were listening to the voters and didn't look as evil as they were/are. So the inquiry was a sham.

My son suffered in his education. It took a year for him to settle in leaving one year to get back on track before going on to high school. Being ADHD, he needed no change at that stage of his schooling. He needed a small school and smaller classes and teachers that knew him and his needs and what could trigger a bad bout of behaviour, which he didn't get at his new school. He was upset and scared about leaving people he knew and having to try make new friends which is hard for him to do.

Thank you