Hi, I'd like to say that the corflutes on the side of the road are terrible, and an unavoidable form of junk mail. If businesses aren't afforded the same luxury then why should politicians, who are ultimately servants of the public - they shouldn't be granted extra privileges beyond the rest of the community. They are an eyesore, probably bad for the environment, and promote laziness in our politicians who think that a photo is enough to garner public favour - they should be encouraged to adopt more innovative and engaging methods to distribute their message, instead of a lame photo on the side of a road. Maybe by doing away with this visual pollution there might be an impetus for politicians to talk to the community regularly throughout the 4 years, not just 2 months prior to an election.
